

Why Is the USA the World Leader In Higher Education

The United States has been the premiere destination for international students from all over the world for a century. The main advantages of higher education in the USA can be summarized as follows:

World-class institutions of higher learning

The United States has more institutions of higher learning than any other country in the world. More importantly than that, however, is the quality of these academic bodies. Most American colleges and universities offer top-notch education programs with highly qualified teaching staff. The research at many of these universities is cutting-edge and often published in major journals worldwide. Many of the professors at these schools are leading authorities in their field. The list of world-class learning institutions in the USA is endless and include, but are not limited to: Princeton, Stanford, Harvard, Yale, Cornell, California Institute of Technology, UC Berkeley, University of Pennsylvania, MIT, John Hopkins, Northwestern University and many other.

Plethora of study choices

One of the major advantages regarding studying in the USA is the vast number of academic options offered to students. Since the USA is such a large country with many resources, almost every field of study is can be found in many of the university institutions in the country. One can study everything from Russian history to nuclear physics,. That is why so many foreign students make efforts to obtain their training in the USA.

Worldwide recognition

A degree or certificate from a college or university is useless if it is not recognized by employers, other institutions or field authorities. Therefore, it is of the utmost importance to ensure that the degree from the school one chooses is recognized in the place one plans to use it in. It is important to note that colleges and universities in the United States are given professional accreditation by different governing bodies that place highest standards and criteria for accreditation. These schools have to earn their accreditation by meeting difficult criteria, helping ensure a quality education, as well as a degree or certificate that is internationally recognized. Thus, most schools in the USA are accredited and credentials and degrees earned from these universities are recognized in almost every corner of the world.

Sponsoring and supporting industries, training and research

Because of the vast wealth of resources in America, the opportunities for practical training related to any field of study are vast. Most colleges and universities have established affiliations with companies and researchers in different fields of study, thereby creating an avenue for students to obtain hands-on invaluable experience. In addition, many universities also require that students obtain practical training in order to graduate. These opportunities are rarely available outside the United States.

People and culture

The USA is a melting pot of people and cultures from all over the world. One will find most Americans to be very hospitable, friendly, kind, generous and accepting of foreigners. In general, the people are funny, gregarious, innovative, and eager to learn. These are traits that many international students experience while studying in the USA, adopting them and take home with them.

Technology

Regardless of what degree a student chooses to pursue in school, he or she will have to use computers and other technologies in order to succeed. Many universities incorporate the latest technology into their curriculum, encouraging students to obtain proficiency before they go out into the workplace. Specialized technology, such as the newest medical equipment in medical schools, allows each student to maximize their true potential and gain experience that is marketable in the real world.

Flexibility

Since the school system in the USA utilizes credit units and often accommodates working students, most schools offer academic programs that are flexible in nature. This means that, very often, one can choose when to attend classes, how many classes to enroll in each semester or quarter, what elective or optional classes to take, etc. An American education is very conforming to each student's needs.

Campus experience

It has been said that the friends and experience obtained during campus life are worth as much as the education itself. Many make friends that last lifetimes. The lessons learned by co-existing and living with others from all over the world are priceless.

Global focus

More and more often, American colleges and universities are focusing on the global aspects of each subject, better preparing students with a worldwide view of their field. No longer can students merely focus on certain geographic areas when obtaining their academic training. Most learning institutions in the USA have recognized this and offer a more comprehensive and global curriculum to meet these new trends.
