Fiction from the book "Death at Intervals." by José de Sousa Saramago /1922-2010/ recipient of Nobel Prize in Literature

Imagine the story of a country where people stop dying

First, people are, in general, thrilled. However, they begin to realise the unpleasant consequences step by step.

The Catholic Church is the first to realise that there is no resurrection without death. And this is a serious problem for the faith.

Life insurance companies and funeral parlours get bankrupt.

The state has a problem with pensions, families with the care of an increasingly growing number of their over-age family members. And nobody inherits.

Organized crime takes the control over. They begin to transport old people to countries where death still exists. ... The government comes to the conclusion that unless people again start dying,

it is over with the country.

The story contains two interesting implicit lessons.

First, the organised crime will take advantage of any "novelty"

very quickly, and second, in general, people are first thrilled and blinded by a change, and after they discover what this novelty means, their enthusiasm fades away.

And the sound of "this is not what we have been imagining" is repeatedly heard.

And the chase for the culprit starts!
